In the study of biology – particularly genetics and neuroscience – predictability relates to the prediction of biological developments and behaviors based on inherited genes and past experiences. Significant debate exists in the scientific community over whether or not a person's behavior is completely predictable based on their genetics.

Weather prediction is, in essence, a problem of predicting the conditional probability distribution  $P_f$  of future atmospheric states given the occurrence of an initial state.

Predictability—defined most broadly as the potential to make a useful forecast—depends upon how different  $P_f$  is from the unconditional (i.e., climatological) distribution  $P$  (e.g., Schneider and Griffies 1999; Kleeman
